Morning discussion with [REDACTED], acting as liaison for [REDACTED], his mother, in reference to questions I posed concerning the incident involving the [REDACTED] and the Marcel's on a Saturday night in late July, or early August, 1947, after the crash at Roswell, New Mexico.

[REDACTED] recalls that as usual, they ([REDACTED]) were invited over to the Marcel's to play Pinochle. That while they were there, Jesse Marcel displayed a piece of crash site wreckage foil and handed it to [REDACTED], and asked her to cut it. She tried, using scissors, and a wire cutter, but was unable to cut the foil. The foil exhibited other properties, such as a tendency to reshape itself.

[REDACTED] reminded Marcel that he was not supposed to have any of the debris in his possession. This was after a time when Jesse Marcel had already turned in the debris that he had purportedly brought home to show Jesse Marcel, Jr., and his wife. Marcel assured [REDACTED] that he would dispose of the material by including it in his back yard cement slab which he was going to pour the following morning.

[REDACTED] is unsure if the piece was ever included, as she did not personally witness the inclusion of the foil into the wet cement. It is possible that Marcel kept the piece, although unlikely, as it would have certainly been presented as supporting evidence when he was making his public disclosure. He might also have turned the piece in to the base.

[REDACTED] does not recollect the address of the Marcel's but suggests the military record of Jesse Marcel would certainly show his address. Jesse Marcel, Jr. should also know where they lived, and could quite possibly recollect the pouring of the cement slab.

[REDACTED] did mention that he believes he told author, [REDACTED] of the kitchen incident.

I swear that this is the true summary of the conversation I had with [REDACTED] this morning of August 23rd, 1995.
