

MEMORANDUM

TO: [REDACTED]

FROM: [REDACTED]

DATE: January 25, 1994

RE: Some thoughts for your meeting

The first decision is to determine what is the goal of the effort. The range of alternatives is quite immense, e.g.:

- Impact U.S. Government decision making on such issues as confidentiality of previously acquired information.
- Influence Governmental leaders worldwide to a given course of action in response to any communication received.
- Persuade members of the human race either selectively, e.g. Americans, newspaper editors, Tibetan Monks, etc. or universally, to accept the communication as in fact being from some extraterrestrial source.

As is abundantly obvious, each of these goals would lead you down a quite different path as regards the planning process and, given the reality that probably each of these three and numerous other possible alternatives as well, are at least objectives if not the ultimate goal, it underscores the complexity of the process that will be needed.

Whatever the goal though quite possibly the major focus at least initially needs to be on source credibility, i.e. from whence is this information coming and is that entity believable. We suggest this concern only in the context of the source and not in the context of the information itself. Obviously, only with survey research can we know for sure, but as is evident in the Roswell book, there seemed to be an acceptance that 'flying saucers' from other planets could exist and most remarkable, at least based on that book, they seemed to generate very little fright within the populace.

Therefore, if the basic message itself is not by and of itself unbelievable, then the key to its believability is 'who, or what organization, is saying it?'

We believe this is the most important challenge/decision the group is facing.

We would not pretend to know who/what this source should be but we do strongly believe that it would be vastly preferred if its not government driven, at least not the U.S. Government, or any domestic brand politicians. That would be even more true in our minds of any one connected with the United Nations.

Having said that, a real search listing all possible possibilities and then aggressively analyzing the pluses and minuses, strengths and weaknesses, of each in a variety of contexts will clearly be necessary.

Beyond this of course comes the tedium of planning as to tactics and timing. However, until these initial two questions are resolved, i.e.

What is the primary goal so to know the primary audience?

Who/what will be the source that reveals this phenomenon?

and the resources available to work with are known, it would seem premature to go to that level of detail.

We hope you find these very initial thoughts of some value and please give us a call when you return.