Appears UFO enigma
is becoming solvable

It would appear that the UFO enigma is becoming solvable.

Recent media attention, both in fictional and quasi-documentary programming — focusing upon certain historic and recent events — have put an emphasis on governmental involvement in what is now being considered a series of realities, not fantasies. What some people have offered as a rationale for past governmental actions seems to make sense. For if there was in fact a governmental cover-up, the viable justification for said actions was to save as much hardship as possible while allowing human institutions and alien activities to simultaneously exist.

For instance, the conclusion that the famed "Project Bluebook" reached, that is, "that UFOs posed no threat to America's national security" was valid and remains valid. It was not a denial of the UFO existence, but a carefully worded statement which required no supportive actions then as well as now. Obviously the careful analysis of any official public statements regarding UFOs leaves our institutions in a position of not only being as truthful as possible (under the circumstances which warrant said posture), but also leaving certain facilities and personnel available to analyze and evaluate the UFO phenomenon in a veil of secrecy.

I would suggest that whatever the initial information the government had about UFOs — and their occupants and the preliminary analysis of said data — warranted not only secrecy but tacit cooperation with alien life forms. Exclusive of other reasons for doing so, I must conclude that the government acted primarily to save lives and not to cause panic and chaos (a good enough reason to hide certain facts and details). Therefore, it would appear that the rationale of decades ago was not only a good one but one that we as citizens shouldn't fault. For, realistically, lack of full disclosure probably was a no-choice situation.
