At two o'clock on the morning of November 4, 1957, in Fort Itaipu, located in the vicinity of Santos, São Paulo, according to a Report by Dr. Olavo Fontes, two guards were on watch duty at the top of the highest lookout tower facing the ocean. Suddenly an orange color light appeared and quickly positioned itself at approximately 50 meters above the guards. With inoperable automatic weapons, they watched the strange glow and high pitched noise emerging from the strange object. Suddenly the two guards were hit by an intolerable heat wave, knocking one of the guards unconscious. The other thought himself to be in flames, and screamed to alert others. The troops in the Fort quickly became alarmed due to a failure of all power systems, including lights, elevators and weapons. Three minutes later the power returned with many officers claiming to have seen the strange object rapidly climb towards the sky. The two guards sustained first and second degree burns over 10% of their bodies. The alarm system and the automatic electric clocks which were originally set for 5 am, went off at 2:30 of the same morning. After the incident the Fort was shut down and investigations by the Brazilian Secret Police and afterwards by North American Officials were conducted. The results were not made available.

Cheney confirms 'stealth' jets dropped bombs on Panama

□ Jets slipped

By The Associated Press

QUARRY HEIGHTS, Panama — Advanced-technology "stealth" jets slipped through Panamanian air defenses and dropped two 2,000-pound bombs on a military base in the early hours of the U.S. invasion, said Defense Secretary Dick Cheney.

Cheney told a Monday news conference in Panama that the raid before dawn Wednesday was intended to "stun and disorient" the Panamanian Defense Forces at Rio Hato before airborne troops were dropped there.

The troops attacked an officers' school and base of the Machos de Monte battalion, one of deposed Gen. Manuel Antonio Noriega's crack units.

The raid, first reported by a Pentagon spokesman on Saturday, was the first combat use of the F-117A fighter jet that employs "stealth" technology designed to elude radar. To date, the super-secret fighter built by the Lockheed Corp. has been kept from public viewing, with a squadron based in Nevada.

A photograph of the plane released by the Pentagon last year depicts a relatively small swept-wing plane with a flat underbelly. From some angles it looks like a stingray. Stealth technology makes extensive use of exotic composite materials, some of which absorb rather than reflect radar waves, and avoids sharp surface angles.

Cheney refused to elaborate on negotiations over Noriega, who is wanted in the United States on drug trafficking charges. Noriega sought refuge Sunday in the Vatican Embassy.

"It is U.S. policy that we would like to see Noriega brought for trial," he said, adding that the military's role in the hunt for the general had ended and "now it is up to diplomats and lawyers."

Cheney said he met with President Guillermo Endara and vice presidents Ricardo Arias Calderon and Guillermo Ford and was "tremendously impressed with their determination to get the government of Panama back on its feet."

He would not say what they talked about.

Cheney also said U.S. troops had discovered a larger supply of Cuban weapons in Panama than they did during the American invasion of Grenada six years ago.

"It is sure far more weaponry was found than Mr. Noriega could conceivably use even if he armed his forces several times over," Cheney said. "I'm not sure what the purpose of this is."

Cheney said additional troops sent for the invasion "will stay as long as they are needed. We don't want to leave too soon before the objective has been achieved."

Cheney noted that the United States does not turn over the Panama Canal for 10 more years and said, "There were troops here before so there will continue to be a U.S. military presence for the near future."

The defense secretary visited troops earlier Monday and called the invasion "the most surgical operation of its size ever carried out, not only by our forces but by anybody else's forces."

theft case — the mastermind was just three years old!

And they hung their heads in shame when they discovered that the pint-sized robber had ripped off diamonds, artwork, and cash worth $5 million.

It was just too much for the humiliated officer in charge of the case — he committed ritual suicide after discovering that he'd been outwitted by a toddler.

Only then did his superiors learn the full details of the incredible crime spree.

Baby burglar

The baby burglar's mother worked as a maid and, while she cleaned houses, he cleaned up, stuffing jewels and money into his pockets. Occasionally he even ripped down artwork, rolled it up and carried it off.

Masato Kimura had the run of some of Tokyo's biggest mansions when he went to work with his mother, Kimiko Kimura.

The year-long string of thefts might have gone on forever if a gardener hadn't spotted the child stuffing jewelry into his pants.

Li Tanaga, the police lieutenant who chased the pair for a year, committed suicide in the traditional Japanese way by impaling himself upon a long sword.

"I have dealt with criminals all my life and was generally able to catch them," he wrote in a suicide note. "The only one who outwitted me, who made a fool of me, was a mere child."

Police believe the mother taught her tot to steal by placing glittering stones around their apartment and getting him to find them.

After she was arrested, the toddler was placed in a foster home, where a very close eye is being kept on him.

"They don't want him cleaning out the house of its valuables," a police officer said.

JET BLASTS UFO OUT OF THE SKY

A FLYING saucer was forced down in the desolate Kalahari desert after a South African jet fighter blasted it with a futuristic laser cannon.

Incredibly, two alien beings were recovered alive — and sent to Wright-Patterson Air Force Base in Dayton, Ohio.

That's the astonishing claim of UFO researcher Tony Dodd, who received confirmation from two different sources.

"I was given official documents bearing the South African military stamp," Dodd, a retired policeman, told the EX-AMINER. "At the present time, everything seems to indicate it is true."

According to the report, the UFO was tracked by radar as it flew toward South Africa.

Ground stations tried unsuccessfully to contact the craft by radio, and it was finally intercepted by two South African Mirage jet fighters.

One pilot shot the UFO with an experimental laser cannon, sending it plunging into the Kalahari desert, where it crashed in one piece.

was brought back to a South African air force base. Inside were two alien entities, one of which was injured.

"South African authorities were quickly joined by personnel from the United States, and the aliens were removed to Wright-Patterson aboard two large transport planes."

The report said the aliens were four feet, five inches tall, with smooth, grayish blue skin. Their heads were large, their mouths mere slits, and their large, almond-shaped eyes had no apparent pupils.
