Dear [REDACTED] and Steve, I am sorry to hear about your surgery, and hope you will get better soon.

Another medical doctor friend of mine also commented about different bones in the skull, but you guys are the experts on anatomy, not me! That would certainly be something to mention if it is a strong case?

My landline number here is [REDACTED] in Sydney, [REDACTED], UTC plus 11 hours, Eastern Australian Daylight Time.

I agree informally with your assessment, as do several other scientists who have looked casually at the new Chilean mummy paper. Yet to say formally "fraud" implies "intent", as if we could read their minds?

We cannot know that for sure. Even if we are thinking about "mothers eating too much bacon (sodium nitrate) and getting babies who look like aliens". Or "strange bone changes due to DNA mutations in the Incredible Hulk". How could anyone really take this seriously? 🍌

I will send you a brief assessment of the Chilean mummy work in terms of scientific technique in a few minutes, which you can check or edit as you wish, along with other DNA experts in the USA? I prefer that I not be listed as a formal author of that critique, although you can say that you discussed it with me?

Incidentally I am American by birth, born in Jacksonville, Florida where two of my ancestors were Presidents of the Florida Medical Society
<https://www.metrojacksonville.com/article/2011-aug-inside-the-dr-horace-drew-residence> Then I took a BS in Chemistry at Davidson College just north of Charlotte, before I went to Caltech and began to work on DNA. It was because I saw a saucer close in daylight Florida 1965, after a dog was barking at it, that I decided to study science. At the time I thought it might be a secret Russian weapon, after the Cuban missile crisis of 1963, so rang up some military bases nearby to report it! And now they keep saying that "there aren't any". After 1999 I began to find UFO/crop circle research more interesting than mainstream science, so began to work there privately for many years.

Will be glad to chat tomorrow about noon in this time zone, or earlier if you wish? I also hope that other DNA scientists in the USA will support you on this issue? In a few days there will be a talk here about the new Peruvian mummies by a member of their team, plus I know Jaime Maussan and Fernando Correa well. So I will go there and see what to make of it? Three fingers? <http://cropcirclesdatabase.com/20120726UKwm>

Best wishes,  in Sydney 9:10 AM Wednesday, having hot tea
