All,

I agree with Steven. I knew what I was getting into when I started this so I am prepared (more or less) for the way humans are. And I agree... engaging only creates more tension.

I sincerely appreciate the support. I am in this with the "team", so causing more tension is not needed as I don't want to reflect badly on the movie.

And... I am not going to police every website. Some of the ones I've found are already so off base it's actually funny.

Such is life.

In the meantime, been reading Wharton Business School Professor Adam Grant's new book on "Give and Take". Interesting read with a quick message: <http://www.giveandtake.com/>

Team:

This site has frequently had inaccurate info on my work. Hundreds of other sites do.

After doing this for over 20 years it is my experience to voice your view, then move on. The more one threatens- or even engages- the more such figures will create a controversy, cry cover-up, create conspiracies and the like.

Moreover, when one engages, it lowers us to them. Never a wise strategy.

If what he says is brought up subsequently, just state that he did not understand you and mis-represented your views. Period.

The WORST -writ large- thing we could do is engage a lawyer and make a first rate scene out of it.

 am sorry he did not get your feedback prior to posting- but this is usually the case.

There are places out there now that are claiming I am 1) a CIA agent 2) a hoaxer 3) a reptilian ET , complete with photoshopping of me and a Disclosure Project witness from Lockheed Skunkworks to move like reptiles (I kid you not) 4) another ET species 5) a member of the Cabal 6) worse.

Generally, it is best not to engage such non-sense, or it is all we would do. At most, you may wish to post on his site your own correction- but this is fraught with the danger of engaging in a ceaseless, time-consuming and pointless dialogue that spirals into more craziness.

On another note: it is my firm belief that the Atacama Humanoid (which means human-like specimen) has an intrinsic paradox of clinical vs genetic findings that may or may not be resolved in the near - term

I think it is a mistake to call it ET; however, it may be a mistake to call it human, per se, since that mean homo sapiens- and it may or may not be. Neanderthal is a separate species (some say sub-species) and is over 99% the same as humans. But a neanderthal is not human. So far the specimen we have is human-like (which is a 'synonym to humanoid) but it may or may not be human, strictly speaking. The earth and universe hold many mysteries.

Unfortunately, neither the lay public - and especially the media- have any interest in nuance, or for that matter the facts. For this reason, I think we need to say, well, there IS a paradox here, and nobody knows yet what the specimen is, and that much more research is needed. And even then, there may be questions and uncertainties.

My two cents worth...Steve

I think Sterling has been supportive of the film outside of this, so lets try option 1 first.

Arm or I are happy to have that discussion or the best option may be Steve because of the previous history. Let me know if someone prefers to handle this. Otherwise we will reach out on Monday.

By the way—I expected something like this, but not from Sterling. I can “deal” with it—I’ll just deny both having said what he said I said, and will be forced to be more “adamant” that my findings so far are that it is human.

I agreed with Steven that I would take this to the end. I think there are other ways to study the specimen to ensure I didn’t miss anything. But those “new” ways to look at this will be looking for subtleties that “standard” science would not usually use.

Sterling is only making “our” job more difficult. I like him as a person, and respect what he is trying to do on a number of fronts, but he doesn’t help.

Anything anyone here can do to have him tone back what he says I am saying on his website would help. I am happy he is willing to speculate—that’s the whole point of the exercise—but it cannot be by misquoting me.

All in all, this is not a “huge” problem for me and I will stop whining after this email about it. But it does cause me to “pull back”.

Sadly—people who I thought would be more thoughtful just posted something like this on their website. They totally took me out of context and said I said things I never said.

http://pesn.com/2013/04/27/9602303 Sterling on Garry-Nolans Evidence of Atacama-Specimen being Hybrid-Humanoid/

This is exactly the sort of reason serious scientist steer away from things like this.

It would be excellent to obtain further such evidence. It is unfortunate that the one found in 1996 in Russia was confiscated, allegedly by the FSB.

Administering such a search would be a full time effort for a number of people: fundraising, vetting all the submissions, testing and so forth. Hopefully if we can get the word our further about the film and there is sufficient funds in place this could be done. Emily and I are really swamped at this point and could not take this on. Steve

Dear Dr. Greer, [REDACTED] and team,

Ready for a wild idea? Half Film Marketing/Half Scientific Advancement...

"If I had more than one specimen, than all bets are off" -Dr. Garry Nolan
(Paraphrased)

To help accelerate and settle the human/non-human issue and overall concept of is this, or isn't it the 'smoking gun' evidence everyone's been waiting for, I am thinking about offering a $10,000 reward for the delivery of another intact "Atacama Humanoid." This amount could conceivably grow/be greater by crowd funding the idea or via additional contributors.

The reward would be viewed publicly as emanating from the Sirius Documentary Team for reasons of anonymity and to help propel the marketing of the film.

There could be an area of the website(s) that could track tips, sightings, info, mapping, etc., to engage users on the topic.

Dr. Greer and Dr. Nolan, we would need your help in setting specific requirements for the specimen that would rule out fraud.

Opening this up for discussion...
