

 is the president and founder of The Arlington Institute (TAI), a Washington, DC area research and policy institute. TAI concentrates on studies of the future with emphasis on the emerging global role of the U.S., the changing nature of the concept of national security, and the development of the discipline of foresight.

He has a varied background in both business and the national security sector of government.  has worked in sales, manufacturing, long-range strategic and product planning, the nonprofit social sector, real estate development and advertising and marketing -- mostly with companies that he started himself. His government experience has included stints at the National War College, the Naval War College, the Institute for National Security Studies, the Office of the Secretary of Defense, and the National Security Council Staff.

 is an authority in the area of foresight and long-range strategic planning and has written extensively on a variety of subjects, most lately on the changing nature of national security and the unique period of time that the U.S. security community is experiencing. He was a naval flight officer in the U.S. Navy and Navy Reserve and is a decorated veteran of both the Viet Nam and Persian Gulf wars.

He has been involved in a number of presidential political campaigns, serving in positions of senior responsibility in the areas of politics, issues and fundraising.

The Arlington Institute completed a study in 1991 which proposed a new landmark methodology for long-range strategic planning and, in April of 1992, sponsored an international colloquium on the changing concept of national security which had broad influence in Europe, Japan and the US. TAI links together by international computer conferences a far-flung network of experts and authorities who work on long term and crisis-response projects.
