Hi Steve,

In a nutshell, the French don't see our sky friends as a threat but more as "cosmic brothers" and they are way more philosophical on the subject as well.

Here is what I've got from the F.E.A. site to give you a hint.

*Note that the French military, police, people from the medias give their time benevolently to help the Federation.

The objectives of the Federation are:

- The rallying forces seeking to study all aspects of the UFO phenomenon at the international level.
- The establishment and financing of communication projects and studies of these events.
- The design and development of communication tools that meet the expectations of the media public and private institutions and more generally the large international audience.

These objectives involve:

- Support the public in the integration of new fields of knowledge that allow the study of the UFO phenomenon.
- To prepare the public opinion to the many changes of paradigms inherent to the recognition of these events.
- Contribute to the implementation by States of an international protocol for processing information on the subject.

They believe from all the informations they gathered on the subject from all around the world that were on the verge of a paradigm shift similar to the discovery of Galileo when humans thought the Earth was the center of the solar system. They have a more philosophical and humble approach to the subject

They don't see them as a threat and they quote [REDACTED] on that.

Here are two excerpts (that I quickly translated) that will give you a good idea of their position on the subject.

"The destruction of our society either directly or in an ethnocidal process is clearly not their goal. Otherwise, we would no longer there to talk about it. Should we assume that the application of such an ethics of these companies, implies de facto recognition, rather like "cosmic big brothers " than as tourists, sociologists, armed with impenetrable neutrality dealing with less developed societies that are possibly in big trouble? In this sense, the UFO phenomenon stimulate us to express a moral wider than the one we are showing now? Conduct that necessarily relies on a more open mind about life in the universe. And who would embrace the many forms of life and intelligence by treating them on an equal status despite differences in the stage of their evolution."

"At first glance, our visitors do not seem to follow the acquisition strategy proper to humans were the weak gets invaded by the strong. This also requires that our ufologist question the relevance of our positioning as well as the rule of a more mature social ethics from these visitors. An ethic applied to their foreign policy, in their approach of civilizations "developing". An ethic whose obligation is to restrict the negative impact of their contact to our young and still unprepared society. Preparation which would theoretically lies upon our political power with the complicity with our scientific institutions."

Hope this has helped you
Have a great day
