

1

About 10:30 P.M. on Thursday, July 21, I stepped out of my barn door to take a leak, and noticed through the tops of the trees an intense white light moving slowly in my direction. I live on the edge of a forest, so don't have a large horizon when the foliage is on the trees. The light came into view above the tree-tops as a precise half-circle emitting intense white light. There was a thin band of deep sapphire-blue light around the curved part of the half-circle, but not along the straight part. It was about twice the size of the moon. I looked to see if the moon was also visible, but did not see it. There were some clouds in the sky. The light, which had appeared from the west, stopped moving and hovered above the trees. Although it is difficult to estimate distances, I guess it was about a quarter of a mile away. There was no sound.

I could not make out any structure, even with the help of binoculars. All that registered was intense white and sapphire-blue light. It was not so intense as to hurt my eyes to look at it, but I was wearing tinted glasses for night-driving, which I always wear as they are my only remaining pair of glasses with my prescription in them. It did not emit any beams of light. After I had watched it for about five minutes, I phoned Barbara Bartholic in Tulsa. She asked me if I had any missing time. I said no, as before going to the door I had been watching the Democratic Convention on TV, coverage of which had just ended and gone on to the local news, all of which I could hear from just outside the front door where I was standing, and there had been no gaps. I told Barbara I was going to go back and see if it was still there, and would phone her again as soon as it took any definite action, such as going away or approaching closer.

I stepped out the door and it was still there, in the same position. After about 15 more minutes, it slowly went over the tree-tops in a slightly different direction from which it had come in, going toward the north-west. It did not have to travel far to go out of sight in that direction, where the forest comes almost right up to my barn. I phoned Barbara and told her it was no longer in sight, and I'd phone her back if there were any further developments.

That night it took me a long time to go to sleep, as I was understandably quite excited. I finally fell into a very deep sleep in which there was some very intense dreaming, which I am unable to remember, except for the brief fragment of it which woke me up. I dreamed that there was someone at my door, and woke up convinced that there was actually someone at my door, someone with a light at my door. I sat up in bed and looked around. I can see the door from my bed, and always leave a dim night light on. The door was shut as usual, and there was no unusual light or knocking or other sounds. The dogs were quiet. It was still the middle of the night. I didn't look at my watch, just realised I had been dreaming and went back to sleep.

On the following day, I checked my body for unusual marks or aches or pains, but did not find any. My health appeared to be normal, except that I couldn't seem to get enough sleep. I normally sleep about ten hours a night. During the two days that followed the incident, I slept the double of what I normally sleep. I was sleeping a full twenty hours a day. I would sleep 12 or 14 hours, much longer than usual, then get up, have a cup of tea since I'm out of coffee, sit down in front of my typewriter, then find myself dropping off to sleep all over again, and would wind up by going back to bed, as there is no point in sitting in front of a typewriter if one is unable to concentrate. However, by the third day my sleep patterns and ability to work had returned to normal.

As dusk fell on the evening after the incident, July 22, I looked at the moon and saw it was exactly at its half. I then began to doubt my own perceptions. After all, I have been working non-stop on my new book about UFOs for many months, my attention completely focused on this subject. For the last two months I have been living in complete isolation, without any human contact at all except by mail or telephone, living on a close-to-starvation diet due to lack of money. I hadn't taken any hallucinogenic drugs during this period, not even grass, as none was available. But I had been excited by the enthusiasm generated at the Democratic Convention, and perhaps that, in combination with the prolonged social isolation and Spartan diet, had caused me to hallucinate. I phoned Barbara in Tulsa and expressed these doubts. She reminded me that it had been about 10:30 P.M. when I had phoned her the night before, and suggested that I wait until 10:30, take a look at the sky, and then call her back. If the moon was visible in the same area of the sky where I had perceived the luminous phenomenon, then I probably did hallucinate, but to wait until 10:30 and then check it out.

I waited until 10:30, then once again opened the door and stepped outside, being careful to position myself exactly where I had stood the night before. The half-moon was clearly visible, but in a completely different portion of the sky than what I had perceived. The moon was to the south, and much higher in the sky than what I had perceived, which had been just above the tree-tops. Besides, the blue-rimmed intense luminosity had been entirely different from normal moonlight. I phoned Barbara, and we agreed that on the previous night the moon had probably been behind a cloud, so what I had seen was probably not the moon.

That night I again had an unusually heavy sleep, in which there was intense dreaming that I was again unable to recall, except for a brief final fragment: that there was someone standing at the door, which was open, wearing a strange hat, similar to the very broad-brimmed straw hats worn by peasants in south-east Asia. I couldn't tell if the figure was male or female, or recall other details of the clothing. It did appear to be of normal height, but was holding its head at an angle such that the wide brim of the hat concealed the face.

On the following night, July 23, I again emerged from a deep sleep in which there had been intense dream activity, able to remember only one brief final fragment of it: that there was someone standing at the door. That someone was the Egyptian god Anubis, a human with the head of a jackal, but instead of the traditional Egyptian regalia, he was wearing a modern military uniform. In the dream what astonished me was not a human with the head of a black dog appearing at my door, as in the dream I recognised him as my old friend Anubis. What astonished me in the dream was to see my old friend Anubis wearing a modern military uniform, instead of his traditional Egyptian regalia.

These are the only fragments of the puzzle that have come to light so far, except for one incident that occurred about a week before the UFO sighting. I don't know how it connects with the rest of the puzzle, but have a strong intuitive hunch that somehow it does connect. I don't remember the exact day, just that it was about a week before the sighting.

It was about 11 A.M., the time the mailman usually passes. I heard the mailman's car pull up by the mailbox, and started to run toward the door of my barn, being eager to get my mail, then suddenly recoiled and did a double-take, finding myself confronted with a copperhead about four feet long, which had crawled inside the house, and was between me and the door. I had left the door open, as I usually do after waking up in the morning. I have come upon copperheads and other snakes, both venomous and not, many times when walking in the woods, and always carry a machete during snake season when walking in the woods in case there is a problem, but in my ten years in the Ozarks have never once had to use the machete on a snake. What has always happened is that upon seeing the snake, I freeze, we look at each other, then the snake continues on its way and I continue on my way. This time I froze, and we looked at each other, but the copperhead was not moving. He was not going to retreat, he was not going to continue on his way, he was going to go for me. So I grabbed my machete and got him before he got me, whacking his head off. Having done this with regret, as I hardly ever kill a wild animal if I can avoid it, I wondered whether I should add him to my usual pot of stew to get some much-needed protein, but didn't know how one would go about cooking a copperhead. I offered the carcass to the dogs, who usually leap upon any carcass in no matter what condition avidly, but the dogs weren't interested. I decided that if the dogs weren't interested, it might not be good for me either, so picked it up with my machete and threw it in the bushes. What makes me think that this incident is connected to the UFO incident is that the area where I whacked the snake's head off was spattered with snake-blood and venom, leaving a stain on the cement floor that is still there. That is the exact same area where in my dreams I perceived the figure wearing a hat similar to a Vietnamese peasant hat, and the Egyptian god Anubis wearing a modern military uniform. This area is also only two steps away from where I was standing while watching the anomalous nocturnal light.

I received a phone call a few days later from Linda Howe, and was about to tell her what had happened, when she started telling me about new information coming in that supports the theory of warfare between two rival E.T. groups, which humanity is in the middle of without realising it. One E.T. faction is led by reptilian humanoids (short Grays), and is at present dominant. The other faction is led by E.T.s ancestral to humanity (tall Blonds or "Swedes"), who have at present been obliged to retreat to other dimensions that are inaccessible to the Grays, but are preparing to return suddenly in force, in order to liberate this planet from the domination of the Grays. So that also connects in some way with the copperhead episode.

A few days after that, I received a whole batch of important information concerning reptilian humanoids from researcher Tal Levesque, who included a tape entitled "The Kláatu Dreams". This tape is a highly sophisticated mix of a wide variety of material, which climaxes with a portion of a sermon in which the preacher predicts that when least expected the archangel Michael will come out of the sky and strike off the head of that great serpent, Satan. So that also connects.

In view of the bizarre personality changes being noticed in some researchers recently, I have been particularly attentive to anything which might even hint at a major shift in thought-patterns. However, I picked up my work on the book from exactly where I had left off, developing the same themes I had been at work on as vigorously as before, without any noticeable shift in opinions. The only type of negative effect, either mental or physical, has been the two days of extreme fatigue, which was alleviated without further inconvenience by sleeping about 20 hours a day for those two days.

On the morning of Aug. 30, I dreamed that I was living in a large house, quite different from my present one, as if I was wealthy and there were quite a few family members and friends living with me. The front doorbell rang, and I went to answer it. When I opened the door, there facing me was my skeleton. I knew it was my skeleton, not just a skeleton. It was of a gray color, as if covered or coated with some substance of that color with roughly the texture of clay. My reaction was to treat it just like any other guest who turned up at the front door, tired and dirty from traveling. I said, "Oh, come on in!" with no surprise at all, and directed it down stairways and through rooms, saying "There's a room over here where you can rest for a bit. Then when you've had a rest, we can get you cleaned up." In my mind, getting it cleaned up had to do with washing off the gray clay-like substance. The skeleton seemed surprised at my reaction, or rather lack of reaction, as if it had expected me to panic. In the dream my logic was that this was something that had been extracted from me, and that I was able to function without, since I was still walking around and functioning normally, so I had no need to be concerned, beyond feeling somewhat responsible for its well-being, as one would for a visiting family member. I was showing it the way to a room where it could rest when the alarm went off, as I had agreed to meet a neighbor who was driving into town early in the morning.

As I re-read the dream after writing it down, a line from one of my early LSD poems came to mind: "after I have made a flute from the bones of my own skeleton, then I can begin to dance."

Thinking of the way I had described the skeleton, as something that had been extracted from me and that I was able to function without, I wondered if the dream might have been a screen memory of the Grays having made a clone of me. Even if they had done this, since there had to be at least one cell of the real me in it, I felt I should be able to have some degree of control over it. I felt certain that if I had reacted with fear when it appeared in the doorway, it would have dominated me and turned me into a slave. Since I did not react with fear or any other negative emotion, I had retained control of the situation.

Barbara Bartholic has repeatedly described to me how at one point during her research several years ago, she had to stop her activities because weird accidents kept happening to her and the members of her immediate family. For example, she would be going to mail a letter, and all of a sudden a horse would appear and step right on her foot, sending her to the hospital instead of the post office. Similar types of strange accidents were happening also to her children. She felt as if certain areas of research were forbidden knowledge, taboo territory -- but those are precisely the most interesting areas, where we find out what is really going on, instead of what they want us to believe is going on. She took a break from her research for a while, then after things seemed to have calmed down, she began again, bit by bit at first, then more intensively, particularly after meeting me. She has always expressed dread that these weird accidents might start happening again.

On Aug. 31, Barbara phoned from Tulsa. She had decided to dub a copy of her tape of the lecture that John Lear had given in Dallas, in order to send it to me. In the middle of dubbing the tape, her machine had blown out paranormally, destroying her expensive dubbing machine. She expressed concern that she might be getting into dangerous territory. She had been informed of several abductions involving young children, one of whom was her five-year-old grand-daughter. She had extensive talks with these children, videotaping them as she did so, and found out things she was unable to talk about on the phone. She was very upset, and said she would tell me when she saw me. She mentioned that her daughter, mother of the grand-daughter, had also been abducted, but that she had only videotaped the children. She said one weird thing that kept happening while she was videotaping the children was that the phone kept ringing, but every time she picked it up there was strange computer-like insectile buzzing and beeps, so she just hung up. I told her that if she was getting danger signals, it might be a good idea to ease off for a bit. She said she understood that would be the prudent course, but after having found out about what was being done to the children, she was not in a prudent mood, that she was fighting mad to the point of no longer being concerned for her personal safety. This was something the world needed to know about. I wished her luck, and that was the end of the conversation.

On Sept. 9 the wife of the old sea-captain who lives nearby loaned me a book by Riley Crabb of Borderland Sciences Research Foundation, saying I could only keep it for one day, because someone else wanted to read it. I read it twice during that one day, and typed out several pages that I wanted to quote in my book, which included the following passage:

"Betty Andreasson's two sons (James, 21, and Todd, 17) were killed in an automobile accident 24 hours after she decided to change her mind about serving the aliens, and to break her agreement with them. Before the accident, while she and Bob Luca were talking on the phone, a male voice, livid with anger, spoke to them in an unintelligible tongue. Peculiar tickings and tones could be heard. Vivid mental impressions overwhelmed Betty's mind, causing her great sorrow. Frightened, she and Bob terminated the phone call and phoned their respective UFO investigators to report the weird happening. To Raymond Fowler she said: "They were angry, just like an insect. It was like you would picture a mad hornet or an ant gouging away at something. The words just kept on going and repeating over and over."

One of the reasons I typed out that passage was the similarity between that phone call and the phone calls Barbara had described.

The next morning, Sept. 10, I go to my mailbox and what do I find but a letter from Riley Crabb, mailed from New Zealand on July 19, saying how much he liked my book, explaining that he now lives in New Zealand, having had to leave the United States because the CIA made life intolerable for him here.

Sept. 11 Barbara phones me, and informs me in tears that on Sept. 4 her daughter, the mother of the grandchild, had an automobile accident. Before the daughter left home that day, as she looked in the mirror, the words came into her mind, "I'm too young to die." She dismissed this and continued what she was doing, which included driving her pickup along a stretch of road she drives over almost daily. No one has yet been able to figure out why the pickup went out of control and down an embankment, sending her through the windshield. She was in the hospital, hovering between life and death, her face destroyed, her husband not knowing where to find the money necessary for plastic surgery.

There is not much one can say to comfort someone in a situation like that. Words are inadequate. I did my best, but was painfully aware of the inadequacy. We agreed that it was not a time to push the research any further, that the emphasis should be on organising the information already obtained, rather than continuing to search out new information.

On the next day, Sept. 12, I received a phone call from my wife in France, saying that on Sept. 7 our youngest daughter had an automobile accident in Chicago, in which she went through the windshield, and was in the hospital hovering between life and death, her face destroyed, her husband not knowing where to find the money necessary for plastic surgery.

I crumpled up into a state of shock from which I have not yet emerged.

I phoned Linda Howe and told her what had happened. She thought it must be coincidence. I replied that in view of the multiple synchronicities, I did not consider that to be likely. As we were talking, she said "Just a minute, there's a call on the other line." I waited. When she came back on, she said that the call on the other line had been weird computer-like buzzing and beeping, like what Barbara had described, but she still thought the accidents of the two daughters had to be coincidence. I could only repeat what I had already said. Once again she asked me to wait, as there was a call on the other line, which turned out to be again the weird computer-like buzzing and beeping. In spite of all this, she continued to insist that it must be coincidence, so we left it at that and said goodnight.

Another chunk of material I summarised from Riley Crabb's book before finding out about the "accidents" may be relevant. According to Crabb, the first direct contact between E.T.s and high-level U.S. government officials took place in 1954 at Muroc Dry Lake at Edwards Air Force Base in California. The E.T.s present on that occasion were what Crabb terms the "Good Guys", the same group I've been referring to as the Blonds, in appearance very much like us. They warned President Eisenhower and the members of his staff that the nuclear arms race must be stopped, or a war that destroyed the planet's biosphere would be inevitable. They refused to provide us with any weapons systems, but offered to show us how to obtain free energy, so we would no longer be obliged to pollute our environment to produce energy. Eisenhower listened to his advisors, and made the wrong choice. Bernard Baruch did not want to see ~~the economic system~~ free energy disrupt the economic system. Bishop McIntyre did not want to see the anti-Communist drive of the Church blunted, or the Church's dogma challenged. The Chiefs of Staff did not want to give up their nuclear weaponry. So Eisenhower refused the offer of the Good Guys (Blonds), who moved out as the Insectoids (Grays) moved in. The E.T. group our government has been dealing with ever since has been the Insectoids (Grays), who I now think of as the celestial Mafia.

My daughter is now out of the hospital and out of danger, but still in need of plastic surgery. My wife is on her way over from France, and will arrive within the next few days.

How did your visit with Tom work out?

George