

Two "flying saucers" that Warren Botz saw parked on the ramp at MacDill Air Force Base, Tampa, Florida in 1965. They had tricycle landing gear with control surfaces running along the circumference of the disc. The crew compartment was located dead center on the top of the craft.

Warren Botz found an actual flying saucer

Since 1965, Warren Botz has known of a TOP SECRET program that was so clandestine that he didn't reveal it even to his own wife. At MacDill AFB in Tampa Florida, he had seen four USAF flying saucers parked on the ramp. Two years later, one of them was spotted over Miami, and the sighting was reported in the Miami Herald, Tampa Tribune, and other major newspapers. But the Air Force was saying nothing.

In 1978, Warren attended a reunion of the Flying Tigers, with whom he had flown in WWII. The reunion was in Dayton, Ohio, so a tour of Wright-Patterson AFB was part of the program. The group was being shown the restoration hangars when Warren wandered off from the group and in another hangar saw a flying saucer identical to those he had seen in Tampa. He was quickly hustled out of the building and heard no more about the strange craft until July of 2005 when a CIA agent called him from Chicago and asked Warren to meet him at Olmsted Airport, in Harrisburg.

He met the agent, and they spent hours talking about what Warren had seen and what he thought about it. Years after that meeting, the program was declassified, and the whole story, including an interview with Warren, was telecast on the History Channel earlier this year. So now this remarkable story can be told. The U.S. Air Force did have its own flying saucers.
